Motorcycle fans, start your engines — that is, if you don’t have too much gospel.

The Edmonton Police Service (EPS) is kicking off their second season of bike sound level enforcement by offering bikers free testing clinics to make sure their bikes comply with the Edmonton Community Standards Noise Bylaw.

“If you’re concerned about your motorcycle and how much noise it’s emitting, we’d be more than happy to test your vehicle, and let you know how you fare,” said Const. Eric Thewsor, who is overseeing the noise level program.

The EPS noise level testing program has been expanded since last year, adding another 10 trained officers to the 36 trained last year.

Motorcycles should be less than 92 decibels while idling, and be less than 96 decibels at any speed above idle.

People who live in certain areas can be subjected to a large amount of noise,” said Thewsor, “it’s a big issue.”

Chris Reall from EPS technical is in charge of training police officers proper sound testing techniques.

Reall said motorcycles with stock factory parts should have no problem with the bylaw, as all on-road bikes are built to certain factory noise standards. The bylaw aims to crack down on bikers with custom exhaust systems that increase the bike noise.

“The only way they get out of compliance is a deliberate modification, like a racing exhaust installed on an on-road vehicle,” Reall said. “This test procedure has been designed around being able to make it simple for the community.”

Raymond Polier, an Edmonton biker who installed a set of custom exhaust pipes on his motorcycle, isn’t worried about the bylaw. He said it only cracks down on bikes that are excessively loud.

“Some bikers just like to make some noise,” said Polier. “Unfortunately, that’s why the law is coming up.”

Polier said that controlling the level of noise he makes all depends on the way he rides, and on the streets he tries to remain respectful to the rest of the community.

“You might have loud pipes, but you can keep them at a normal level if you want,” Polier said.

For bikers who choose not to comply, there is a hefty fine of $250 for a first offence, and a $500 fine for a second offence. A third offence will result in a court appearance.

EPS is holding free testing clinics at WINO South Campus on June 4 and 11 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Bikers can have their motorcycles tested for noise compliance before the EPS kicks off their ticketing season.
